Not illustrated. 1903 Excerpt: ...proportional to the amount of surface on coarser particles, it does not hold on particles below 0.35 mm. He tested crushing in a Blake breaker, in rolls working under various conditions, in a one-runner mill (much like the Heberli mill except that one of the discs is stationary), in a Schranz mill and in gravity stamps. The results of his work are given in Tables 177 and 178. The method of making a test was as follows: Lumps of one size were fed to the machine. The power used was measured over a space of 8 to 15 minutes by means of a Seyss dynamometer, both while crushing and while running empty. The crushed products were carefully sized, as shown in Table 178. The surface of the particles in the coarser sizes was measured directly and the surface of an average particle multiplied by the number of particles in a kilogram gave the surface of a kilogram. From the coarser sizes he was also able to obtain a factor showing the relation of the average particle of any given size to the mean sieve hole, that is, the mean of the sieve hole through which it passed and of that on which it rested. This factor served on the finer sizes to reckon the surface of a kilogram of any size, when the number of particles per kilogram was known. With round hole sieves the surface of a mean particle was 3.4 to 4.2 times the area of the mean sieve hole, or 1.27 times the surface of the mean particle changed to a sphere where the diameter of the sphere was about 0.87 times the diameter of the mean sieve hole. For square hole sieves the surface of a mean particle was 4.0 to 4.2 times the area of the mean sieve hole. The greatest assumption made in the calculation was in putting into one class the finest particles, namely those from 0.1 mm. to 0, and dividing the sum of these diameter...
