Not illustrated. 1834 Excerpt: ...the suspicion of any one. 5. Ullus: Scarcely have you left the other orators (with their leave let me speak it) any merit that they can reap. Ullus should always be used instead of omnis after the preposition sine; as, Without all doubt. 6. Unquam: Darius having in his flight drunk water, which was muddy, and defiled with dead bodies, said that he had never drunk with greater pleasure. J (Observe, that, for the sake of brevity, the verb dico followed by non is not inelegantly changed into the verb nego, as, negavi me esse facturum, for dixi me nonjacturum esse). Ne quis is elegantly used for ut nemo.. They discharged him from his office, tuU no one should afterwards commit the same crime with impunity. Nee quidquam is more elegantly said than et nihil. And physicians, generals and orators, although they understand perfectly the principles of their science (quamvis artis pracepta pereperint), can effect nothing very great or meritorious without experience or practice. Ipse is often used for the adjective totus or integer, in defining numbers or space of time with great exactness. 1. I have been absent (desideror) three whole days. 2. I spent three whole months in visiting and exploring a country, which some writers have described in so lively (ad vivum depinxerunt) a manner. The pronoun is is most frequently used for talis, followed by ut or qui; as, non is sum quem contempnas. 1. I am not such a man, that I should utter a falsehood. 2. I have seen such a monster, that if I should see another as terrible, I should die with horror. 3. We must use such liberality as may profit friends, and hurt no one. 4. Many were condemned of treason; but such was the king's clemency, that only three were executed (ultimo supplicio affectifuerint)...

Idem is most...
